Gay rights struggle mutates

The French parliament has begun debating gay marriage. Many countries now offer, or are about to offer, genuine equality and freedom for the LGBT community, though this is not yet universal.

BY GABRIEL GIRARD AND DANIELA ROJAS CASTRO

From the late 1990s, LGBT movements, they gradually transformed and focused on getting the same rights for gay and the other sexual minorities. In the 1990s, gay liberation movements started to develop solidarity campaigns but, as they were met with violence and death threats, many of them were not heard about globally, and annual Gay Pride parades, also called “parades of resistance,” were heard about globally, and annual Gay Pride parades, and in Paris in 1989, symbolised the anger and militancy of the “gay and lesbian movement.”

The word was coined as a critical term in the 1950s by American sexologist Alfred Kinsey to describe the sexuality of “men who are predominantly sexually concerned with other men” and the “non-heterosexual” movement, which was reviving a critical attitude to medical care. Although the word was first used in the 1950s, the concept of a separate identity and political strategy for gay and lesbian people was formed in the 1970s, these activists want to continue hereinafter, and although some orientations are more diverse than others, these groups have shared experiences of discrimination, violence, and state repression. The word was first used in the 1950s, and the concept of a separate identity and political strategy for gay and lesbian people was formed in the 1970s, these activists want to continue hereinafter, and although some orientations are more diverse than others, these groups have shared experiences of discrimination, violence, and state repression. The word was first used in the 1950s, and the concept of a separate identity and political strategy for gay and lesbian people was formed in the 1970s, these activists want to continue hereinafter, and although some orientations are more diverse than others, these groups have shared experiences of discrimination, violence, and state repression.